"Appendix A"

Q: At page 5 you acknowledge that a "common factor to all the chapters is that they are based almost exclusively on written sources in English. Although some potentially relevant material in te reo Maori was available to the researchers, time and resources were unavailable to have these translated.

Have these documents in te reo been included in the document bank to your report? If not, could you please make them available?

Q: At page 141 you discuss the different points of view (citing Loveridge and Hill) regarding whether Maori controlled the councils or not. You note that Hill saw the councils as government controlled, but he only cites one example of Ormsby having "served a long apprenticeship on official 'native committees'".

Can you advise whether you have undertaken any inquiries yourself that show further examples of government-control and, if so, can you please provide those examples to us?

Q: At page 208 you mention that the policing of sly grogging was "often lax" and that it was difficult in all of NZ's dry districts.

Are you able to provide any statistics on the number of prosecutions carried out and a comparison of the prosecutions between different districts within New Zealand?

Q: At page 276, you refer to the case of Valuer-General v Ormsby (1907) 27, p49 where Justice Denniston's refers the matter back to the Assessment Court. Do you know what happened as a result of the matter going back before the Assessment Court?
